

Studying abroad - life lesson

Rebecca Hobbs who studied at Wagga, located west of Sydney Australia, took classes such as graphic design and photography which are classes not offered at UNCW. While at Wagga she took an advertising class where she and other group members created a corporate identity for a real client. "I gained a lot of direction and confidence. I feel pretty confident in who I am and what I want to do in my life now."

"In today's competitive job market, studying abroad can make your resume stand out. The person who has studied abroad will get the job," DiPuccio said. "It helps develop communication skills."

Alexa Sand who is still very close to the U.S. friends she met abroad ten years ago, explains, "I think the shared experience of living fully immersed in another culture made these friendships particularly poignant and enduring."

Joydeep Sengupta says that "An entire range of professional opportunities have opened up to me in recent years, partly due to the skills and internship experiences I gained."
